

The Separation Charade.....The great divide

It is the opinion of the author, that one's fundamental outlook regarding unborn life itself, is reflected in how one views the remainder of life in general. Two people living their testament to humanity brought us into the world. The most hallowed sanctuary that we enjoyed was in our rightful place in our mothers womb. How blessed we were. How we can in good conscience deny this to another human life is unfathomable. Mistakes through immaturity are made. Mistakes through error are made. No mistake however, is made by those who profit from the violent termination of Unborn Americans. Has the law denied a fundamental right to life to Unborn Americans? If not, exactly which law gave America the right to terminate its future? Someone please identify it.

It is certainly very sad that a generation of Americans is coming to maturity knowing that one quarter of their numbers are missing. What have they been taught? That life in the womb is not precious. That life is what you can make of it for yourself. That life includes no commitment to any other. That life is happenstance. That human life and death are in the hands of the powerful who make or interpret the law. That morality is a lofty ideal with no real life application. That power and sex is the only force worth being reconciled to. That humanity has no ultimate purpose, it simply exists for what ever personal benefit can be achieved. That freedom, life and liberty, for those with a voice, may be possible. Freedom, life and liberty for the unborn, those who's voice will not be heard, is subject to restriction.

It seems that America is very closely divided into two camps. Two major national parties exist and major elections give some credence to this observation. Indeed the country has been figuratively painted into red and blue states indicative of their relative position concerning some fundamental ideology. Some generalization of the fundamental characteristics which these two camps profess is attempted. You may see more than I or even disagree slightly, but you will find it hard to disagree with the majority. One or the other group is where we all reside.

Tell me where you stand on the sanctity of Unborn Americans and I will know where you stand on the remainder of the issues facing our country's survival. Abortion on demand, violent deadly delivery of our progeny, is a life-death issue. It is so innate to human freedom that it will not go away. Every attempt to silence it has been frustrated. See "Those who believe"
